II. The action of administering, ordering, or managing, the system by which things are administered.

[This group of senses originates in the L. use of dispensātio to render Gr οἰκονομία in N. T and patristic writers The latter is used in 1 Cor IX 17, Eph. III 2, Col 1 25 for the 'office of an administrator' (see sense 4 below), but in Eph. I. 10, III. 9, for 'a method or system of administration' (specifically that which involved the Incarnation) From this latter arose various theological uses. (1) Tertullian (Adv Praxean II, III, IV.) uses dispensatio=οἰκονομία to denote the Trinity as an administrative arrangement, i e a system of distribution and apportionment of functions designed by the Father for administrative purposes This is known as an œconomical as distinguished from an essential Trinity: in the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will (See the distinction between DISPENSATIVE, DISPENSATORY, and essential) (2) It was applied to the Incarnation (dispensatio assumpti corporis, d. susceptæ carnis, or simply dispensatio) as the basis or organ of the redemptive system under which mankind now live (August Serm 264 § 5) (3) The evangelical system is termed dispensatio gratiæ in opposition to the Law or system of works (August Ep 82 § 20), while the method of salvation by means of the Incarnation is dispensatio salutis nostræ (August Serm. 237 § 1) Hence, in the Latin version of Irenæus, Christ is called dispensator paternæ gratiæ (IV. 20 7) (4) Dispensatio was applied to the divine purpose or decree which established the system, and determined its mode of action (Tertull Adv. Marc. VI 18, Hilar Pict De Trin IX 66, XI. 13); also, by Hilary, to the Passion, as the supreme mystery of Redemption]

II. from med L dispensāre in eccles. use.

[In later med L, (by 1200 or earlier) dispensāre was used absol or intrans (= agere dispensatorie or dispensative), in the sense 'to make an arrangement in the character of a steward (οἰκονόμος), administrator, or manager, to deal administratively,' especially in reference to the practical application of a law or rule to a particular case; first, apparently, in the way of relaxing a punishment or penance, which, according to strict law, had been already incurred, but in the particular case ought to be remitted for special reasons, thence, in the remission of a punishment not yet incurred, which amounted in fact to a licence to break the legal rule; and thus, in the general sense of granting relaxation, exemption, indulgence, etc The chief constructions were dispensare in tali casu, circa jus, circa aliquem or aliquid, and esp cum aliquo (ut possit), etc. (to dispense in such a case, in reference to a certain law, or a certain person or matter, with a person that he may do something, etc) (Prof F W Maitland, LL D)

These intrans uses passed into English, esp dispense with, which became a combined verbal phrase, with indirect passive, to be dispensed with, and has had a wide development of sense. see branch III By elision of the preposition or other processes, the verb has also become trans in the sense 'to grant dispensation to, for, or from' Transitive senses are found also in French from 15th c]

2. Chem. The direct separation of compound substances into their primary elements, or into less complex compounds; decomposition, spec by the action of heat Hence dissociation-point, the temperature at which such decomposition takes place.

Applied usually to the separation of a compound into its elements by the action of heat alone, without the intervention of any substance which breaks up the combination by its greater chemical affinity for one of the elements; but sometimes restricted to such a partial separation of the elements, that they reunite when the temperature is lowered below the dissociation-point. Others have used it in the wider etymological sense of direct separation of elements by any force, and applied THERMOLYSIS to dissociation by heat, as distinguished from ELECTROLYSIS or decomposition by electricity.

3 The action of converting any substance or constituent of a substance into vapour by means of heat, and of again condensing this by refrigeration into the liquid form, by means of an alembic, retort and receiver, or a still and refrigeratory, the extraction of the spirit, essence, or essential oil of any substance by the evaporation and condensation of its liquid solution; and, in a more generalized sense, the operation of separating by means of fire, and in closed vessels, the volatile parts of any substance from the fixed parts, in order to the collection of the products.

As shown by the etymology, the original application is to substances of which the distillates are condensed drop by drop into the liquid form; whether for the purpose of extracting the more volatile part of a substance, or of concentrating or purifying a volatile substance such as water by freeing it from matter held in suspension or solution When no more heat is applied than just suffices to cause the liquid to pass over in drops, the process is called cold distillation Dry or destructive distillation, the decomposition of a substance by strong heat in a retort, and the collection of the volatile matters evolved, as in the destructive distillation of coal in gas-making Fractional distillation, separation of two or more volatile [illegible] points, so that they pass [illegible] can be collected separately. Destructive distillation, distillation with decomposition of the substance distilled, as in the distillation of coal, wood, etc., to obtain products not originally present, or present in much smaller quantity, in the substance distilled. Dry distillation, destructive distillation. Fractional distillation, separation of two or more volatile substances by distillation, so that they pass over at different temperatures and can be collected separately. Wet distillation, distillation of a liquid from a less volatile in order afterwards Distillation by descent (per descensum), in Old Chem., the name given to a method in which the fire was applied above, and the distillate drawn off beneath (see DESCEND). In opposition to this, the ordinary method was called distillation by ascent (per ascensum)

b More recently, after Scholastic usage of Latin distribuere, distributio. The application of a term to each and all of the several individual instances included in its denotation or extension; the acceptation of a term in a general sense including every individual to which it is applicable.

Said of a term qualified explicitly or implicitly by such marks of universality (signa universalia) as all, each, every, any, etc., the one simple common term being treated as 'distributed' over all its significates, e.g. in every man, the term man is spread out over, or dispersed among, this, that, and every other individual man

This use of distributio (which turns on the question discussed in Plato, Parm. 130 seqq.), first appears in the Schoolmen of the 13th cent., as Shyreswod, and especially Petrus Hispanus (1226-1277), of whose Summulæ the 7th chapter deals with the properties of terms, including Distribution, as an appendix to the exposition of the Organon, and with special reference to the solution of sophisms. The term apparently came into English logic through the [illegible] see Distributive v. 6.

Dive (dəiv), sb. [f. Dive v.]

1. The act of diving; a darting plunge into or through water or the like. lit. and fig.

The Amateur Swimming Association distinguishes between a dive and a plunge. The latter is defined as a standing dive made head-first from a firm take off, free from spring. The plunger does not add any further impetus, but allows himself to progress till all forward motion ceases, when he raises his face above water. A dive may be running, from a springboard, and with propulsion added on reaching the water.

Dj- is not an English combination, but is sometimes put to represent the Arabic letter ج jīm, = English j (dʒ), in Arabic, Turkish, or Berber words, which have come to us through a French channel, or are spelt in imitation of French orthography; e g. djebel, a mountain or hill, djerid or djereed, a javelin, djin, genii or familiar spirits, djubbah, an outer garment. So far as these come under the scope of this Dictionary, they will be found under J; for djowr, an infidel, see GIAOUR.

(ge)tān, Ger. gethan, getan; OTeut. types dōn, deda, dēno- : dōno-, from verbal stem dē- : dō- (appearing also in DEED, DOOM, -DOM), the Germanic representative of the Aryan verb stem dhē- dhō-, to place, put, set, lay, in Skr. dhā-, OPers. dā-, Gr. θη- (pres. τίθημι, deriv. sb θωή a penalty imposed), L -dĕre in abdĕre to put away, condĕre to put together, dēdĕre to lay down, OSlav. dĕte, dĕjati, Lith. dėti, Lett. dêt to put, lay

The vocalization of the Germanic vb, esp. the present stem dō- beside the Gr θη- and Slav-Lith dē-, has been variously explained (see e.g. Streitberg Urgerm. Grammr 329). The pret deda is generally held to be a reduplicated form corresponding to Skr dadhāu:—orig dhedhō* The 1st p sing pres. indic had originally the m of primitive verbs in -mi, Skr -mi, Gr. -μι, L -m. viz OE dōm (later dō), OS dōm (dōn), OHG. tōm, tuom (later tuon). This verb is considered by many philologists to be the source of the formative suffix of the pa. t. of weak verbs in the Germanic languages, including Norse and Gothic, in the latter the plural endings -dēdum, -dēdup, -dēdun, are the forms which the pl of the pret deda would have in Gothic.

OE. deviates from the other WGer. langs. in the past dyde, for OS. deda, OHG. teta; the y is now generally explained as a special OE representation of an Indo-germanic weak vowel Thence the pl dydon; the plural corresp to OS dādun, modG thaten, was Anglian dēdon (also-dædon, in Cædmon, etc) In ME dyde, dydon were represented by dude, -en (si), midl & north diden, dide, now did; but dēden (with a sing dēde derived from it like modG that from pl thaten) came down in some dialects to 15th c. In the pres. ind, the and and 3rd pers. sing. in OE had umlaut, dēst, dēð, dēst, dēð, and these forms survived in s w till the 15th c; but ONorthumbrian had, without umlaut, dōas, dōæð, dōas, and in ME the forms dōst, dōth (dōs) are found in north & midl from the 12th c. The pa pple in OE is known only with the prefix ge-, which in ME remained in the south as y-, i- (Forms with ge- are found also in the pa t, and occasionally other parts, which, however, are more properly referred to a derivative vb OE. gedōn, ME. ido, ydo) The final -n of the pple was generally dropped in the south in ME, esp in the forms ydo, ido, whence the ndo (ədʊ) of modern s w dialects.]

 To bestow, impart, grant, render, give (a thing to a person), to cause to befall or come

Orig with dative of the recipient or person affected, and accusative of that which is imparted or caused e g 'it did him credit' But in later use the dative is largely replaced by to and prepositional object, and then changes places with the verbal object: 'it did credit to his good sense'

(The primary notion here appears to have been that of putting (or bestowing) something to a person, being closely related to prec. section, in which a person is put to or into something)

4. To impart to, bring upon (a person, etc) some affecting quality or condition; to bestow, confer, inflict; to cause by one's action (a person) to have (something). In later use, associated more closely with the notion of performance, as in 6, e g to do any one a service = to perform some action that is of service to him

 As a Periphrastic Auxiliary of the present and past Indicative, and Imperative. (Formerly sometimes of the Infinitive)

(For a detailed treatment of this, see 'Das Umschreibende Do in der Neuenglischen Prosa' by Hugo Dietze, Jena, 1895)

As auxiliary of the Indicative (present and past).

Examples of this are found already in OE (as in MDu, O & MLG, mod Ger dialects) It is more frequent in ME, but became especially frequent after 1500, first as a simple periphrastic form without perceptible difference of sense, in which use it has in the s w dialects practically taken the place of the simple form of the verb (e g I dŭ say for I say, he dŭ sum for he seems) But in standard English it is now regularly used only where, for the sake of emphasis, or of word position, it is advantageous to have the verb in two words, so that the auxiliary may receive the stress or be separated from the main verb, like the auxiliaries of the perfect and future tenses, to which the periphrastic present and past is exactly parallel in use Thus Simple Affirmative after certain conjunctive adverbs. 'So quietly did he come that..' (like 'So quietly has he come') Emphatic 'He did drink', 'and drink he did' (like 'I will go', 'and go I will') Interrogative · 'Do you hear?' (like 'Will you hear?') Negative · 'They do not speak' (like 'They will not speak,' 'They have not spoken')

25. In Affirmative sentences

a. Originally, simply periphrastic, and equivalent to the simple tense. Found in OE., frequent in ME, very frequent 1500–1700, dying out in normal prose in 18th c, but still retained in s w dialects, also as an archaism in liturgical and legal use, and as a metrical resource in verse.

c 893 K Ælfred Oros I x § 5 Æftre ðæm hie dydon æȝþer ȝe cyninga ricu settan ȝe niwu ceastra timbredon 1297 R Glouc (1724) 320 Þys lond ofte he dude bytraye c 1420 Chron Vilod 315 In hurre lyff, as we don rede c 1489 Caxton Blanchardyn xlvii 180 She ded call after hym ryght pyteously 1526–34 Tindale John I 45 Of whom Moses in the lawe and the prophetes dyd wryte 1548–9 (Mar) *Bk. b Still used, instead of the simple tense form, in those constructions in which the ordinary order of pronoun and verb is inverted; the use of the periphrastic form allowing the main verb to retain its final position as in the perfect and future.

c 888 K Ælfred Boeth VI, Swa doþ nu þa þeostro þinre ȝedrefednesse wiþstandan minum leohtum larum c 1250 Gen. & Ex 1518 An time dede ysaac flen 1551 Robinson tr More's Utop. (Arb) 145 This lawe did kynge Utopus make 1579 Lyly Euphues (Arb) 45 Ah Euphues little dost thou know [etc] 1588 Shaks *L. 26. In Interrogative sentences.

The periphrastic form with do, did, is now the normal form Its use allows the pronoun to be placed between the auxiliary and main verb, instead of coming after the latter. e g. 'Did he recognize her?' instead of 'Recognized he her?'

In monosyllabic verbs, the simple form may still be used; it is always used in be and usually in have, though very recently (esp in U S) we find do you have? did you have?

c 1386 Chaucer Monk's T 442 Fader why do ye wepe? c 1450 Cov. Myst 196 Dude ȝe hym se? 1549 Latimer *3rd Serm bef. Edw. 27 In Negative sentences

The periphrasis with do, did, is now the normal form with not. Its use allows the negative to come after the auxiliary, instead of following the principal verb. e g. 'We did not recognize him' instead of 'We recognized him not'.

The introduction of the periphrastic do not, did not, was connected with the obsolescence of the earlier usage which placed the negative particle first, 'we ne sungen'

The simple form is still retained with be, have ('do', 'did not have'), is colloquial and recent, chiefly in U S), and is frequent with monosyllabic words as dare, need, with other verbs it is always possible, and not being the ordinary form has an impressive rhetorical effect.

c 1489 Caxton Sonnes of Aymon xxii 472 It is to late to repente me that I dyde not doo. c 1489 — Blanchardyn xli 153 Whan ye dyde not knowe hym. 1564 Grindal Rem. (1843) 22, I do not doubt but that God revealed . other parts 1664 Evelyn Kal Hort (1729) 224 When it does not actually freeze 1719 De Foe Crusoe II iii, They did not take their measures with them, as I did by my man Friday. 1776 Trial of Nundocomar 73/2 If you do not give a plain answer you will be committed 1889 J. 30. As auxiliary of the Imperative.

a In the Imperative positive, adding force to entreaty, exhortation, or command (this usually with the pronoun inserted as 'do you go at once!'); in early times, down to c 1600, it was sometimes merely periphrastic.

The main verb is in OE found both in the Infinitive (α) and the Imperative (β), the Imperative is usual in early ME., in later use (γ) the forms are indistinguishable, but it is usually viewed as Infinitive, as in 25.

α c 1000 Ags Ps (Th) cxviii[i] 25 Do me æfter þinum wordum wel ȝecwician [L vivifica me]

b. For emphasis, do is also added to the main Imperative.

1611 Shaks Wint T v iii 144 Giue me the lie, do 1775 Sheridan Duenna II iv, Get in, do 1838 Dickens O Twist III, Let me say a prayer Do!

c. In do but —, do was perhaps not originally auxiliary, but a main verb = ne do but, do nought but —: cf. But conj 6.

1604 Dekker Honest Wh. IV. i Wks. (1888) 107 Do but think what sport it will be. 1638 Heywood Wise Wom Hogsd IV iv. Wks (1888) 311 Do but wait here 1768 Goldsm Good-n Man V, Do but hear me 1832 Carlyle in Fraser's Mag V. 260 Do but open your eyes

d In the Imperative negative, do not, colloq. contracted don't (dōunt), is now the normal form.

(The simple forms, now archaic, may still be used impressively, as be not, say not, think not, withhold not.)

†31 As auxiliary of other parts of the verb. The 16th c Scottish poets extended the periphrastic use to the infinitive and pples.: thus, to do increes = to increase, done discuss = discussed, doand proclame = proclaiming. Traces of this occur elsewhere.

1508 Dunbar Lament for Makaris 49 He hes done petuously devour The noble Chaucer, of makaris flour a 1520 — Thistle & Rose 24 The lark hes done the mirry day proclame 1513 Douglas Æneis XIII x. 103 Onto his ceptre thou sall do succeid 1556 Lauder Tractate 23 No geir sulde do the faltour bye Ibid 340 As I afore haue done discus 1578 Scot Poems 16th C. II 189 And many other false abusion The Pap hes done invent. 1597 Regn Manor Scawby Lincolnsh (MS), That the Carrgraues shall doe execute theire office truely.

Doddered (dɒ·dəɹd), ppl a [app originally a deriv of DOD v[1] to poll or take the top off (a tree)

It is not clear whether it was a contaminated form of DODDED 'polled', or a mistaken spelling of DODDARD sb, 'doddered oak' for 'doddard oak' (cf pollard willow), while the matter is complicated by the earlier use of dottard or dotard (see DOTARD 2) in the same sense In later use there has been unintelligent association with DODDER sb, and perhaps with DODDER v, and its cognates. It is doubtful whether senses 2 and 3 belong originally to this word]

1. A word conventionally used (? after Dryden) as an attribute of old oaks (rarely other trees), app. originally meaning: Having lost the top or branches, esp. through age and decay; hence, remaining as a decayed stump. Johnson explained it as 'Overgrown with dodder, covered with supercrescent plants'; and this explanation, which was manifestly erroneous, since neither dodder nor any plant like it grows upon trees, has been repeated in the dictionaries, and has influenced literary usage, in which there is often a vague notion of some kind of parasitical accretion accompanying or causing decay.

Dog-days, sb. pl. [tr. L dies caniculares: see Canicular.]

1. The days about the time of the heliacal rising of the Dog-star, noted from ancient times as the hottest and most unwholesome period of the year.

They have been variously calculated, as depending on the greater dog star (Sirius) or the lesser dog-star (Procyon); on the heliacal, or (by some in modern times) the cosmical rising of either of these (both of which also differ in different latitudes), and as preceding, following, or both preceding and following, one of these epochs; and their duration has been variously reckoned at from 30 to 54 days. In the latitude of Greenwich, the cosmical rising of Procyon now takes place about July 27, that of Sirius about Aug 11; in Mediterranean latitudes, the former is somewhat later, the latter earlier The heliacal rising is some days later than the cosmical, and all the phenomena now take place later in the year than in ancient times, owing to the precession of the equinoxes Thus very different dates have been assigned for the dog-days, their beginning ranging from July 3 to Aug 15 In current almanacs they are said to begin July 3 and end Aug 11 (i e to be the 40 days preceding the cosmical rising of Sirius).

The name (Gr ἡμέραι κυναδες, Lat dies caniculares) arose from the pernicious qualities of the season being attributed to the 'influence' of the Dog-star, but it has long been popularly associated with the belief that at this season dogs are most apt to run mad, see Canicular 1, quot. 1601

-dom, suffix [OE. -dōm = OS. -dôm, MDu. -doem, Du. -dom, OHG., MHG. -tuom, Ger. -tum.] Abstract suffix of state, which has grown out of an independent sb., orig. putting, setting, position, statute, OHG. tuom, position, condition, dignity, in OE dōm, statute, judgement, jurisdiction, f. stem dō- of Do v. + abstract suffix -mos, OE. -m, as in hel-m, sea-m, strea-m, etc. Frequent already in OE as a suffix to sbs. and adjs., as biscopdōm the dignity of a bishop, cyningdōm, cynedōm, royal or kingly dominion, kingdom, ealdordōm the position or jurisdiction of an elder or lord; þeowdōm, the condition of a þeow or slave, frēodōm, hālzgdōm, wrasdōm the condition or fact of being free, holy, or wise. The number of these derivatives has increased in later times, and -dom is now a living suffix, freely employed to form nonce-derivatives, not only with the sense of 'condition, state, dignity', but also with that of 'domain, realm' (fig.). See in their alphabetical places alderdom, Anglo-Saxondom, boredom, Christendom, cuckoldom, dukedom, earldom, freedom, kingdom, martyrdom, popedom, sheriffdom, thraldom, wisdom, etc. Examples of nonce-words appear in the quotations.

F. domaine (1611 in Cotgr.), for earlier F. demaine, OF. demeine —L. dominicum, in med.L. = 'proprietas, quod ad dominum spectat', subst. use of dominicus of or belonging to a lord, of the nature of private property, proper, own. See Demesne, which is another form of this word.

OF. demeine, demeine, did not come down from cl. L. dominium lordship, ownership, property, for that could have given only an OF. domein, demein; it is supposed that cl.L. dominicum passed in Rom. and OF. through the stages domenio*, domeine, domeine, demeine of canonicum, canonio*, canonié, canoine, chanoine. But, in the intermediate stage, the form of the word naturally suggested its identity with cl. L. domenium, which consequently appears, beside the original dominicum, as the Latin equivalent in mediæval documents, the latter have also domainium formed on the vernacular. The o was in OF. regularly weakened to e, demeine, whence late AFr. & Eng. demesne; in domaine the o is restored after L.; in French, domaine is now (since c 1610) used in all senses, but in Eng., demesne has been traditionally retained in the legal use, and in senses immediately derived from it, though the two forms overlap.]

Domesday (dōᵘ·mzdā, dūᵘ·mzdā). [f. dómes genitive of dóm DOOM + DAY] A Middle English spelling of DOOMSDAY, day of judgement, now commonly used as a historical term, in the following:

Domesday Book, colloquially Domesday the name applied, from the 12th c, to the record of the Great Inquisition or Survey of the lands of England, their extent, value, ownership, and liabilities, made by order of William the Conqueror in 1086 Extended to abstracts based upon that record, such as the Exon Domesday.

[The name appears to have been derived directly from Domesday the Day of the Last Judgement, and Domesday Book the Book by which all men would be judged It originated as a popular appellation (see Dial de Scacc), given to the Book as being a final and conclusive authority on all matters on which it had to be referred to.]
